One night, a very confused dog named Balto found himself standing in the middle of a literal freezer—also known as Alaska in 1925.

The wind was howling louder than a husky at dinnertime, and the snow was so thick that Balto's human, Gunnar, couldn't even see his own nose. Gunnar eventually just sat on the sled and told Balto, "Look, buddy, I have no idea where we are. If we don't find the town of Nome soon, everyone's getting a very cold nap."

Balto, who was usually just a "background character" dog used for hauling heavy boxes, realized this was his moment. He didn't have a GPS, but he had a nose that could smell a frozen treat from three miles away.

While the blizzard tried to flip the sled over like a pancake, Balto just kept trotting. He led the team across cracking ice and through snowdrifts taller than he was, all while Gunnar was basically a frozen statue behind him.

At 5:30 in the morning, Balto finally sniffed out the town. He trotted onto the main street, looking less like a hero and more like a giant, black-and-white popsicle. He had delivered the medicine, saved the day, and earned himself a lifetime supply of head scratches and a literal statue in New York City.